PREFACE

All countries contribute to the advance of the sciences; the scientific record which is thus cooperatively compiled is a polyglot one.

Formerly the basic languages for scientific communication were English, French, and German; now Russian, Spanish, Italian, and a number of others must be added. Formerly our educational system, capped by a European postgraduate residency, created a high level of language proficiency among scientists; now the formal study of language tends to be crowded aside by other curriculum demands.

These circumstances have created linguistic barriers which have tended to circumscribe the scientist's acquaintance with the literature of his field, and even to parochialize his outlook. This impediment to scientific progress has been recognized throughout the world. UNESCO has been engaged in a major study of the problems of scientific translation. The Department of Scientific and Industrial Research in London and the Indian National Scientific Documentation Center in New Delhi both operate translating centers. The National Science Foundation, Washington, D. C., and the All-Union Institute of Scientific and Technical Information, Moscow, are concerned with two aspects of the same problem: reciprocal translation of Russian and English.

Professional scientific and technical translators have recognized the magnitude of the problem, and commercial translation services have reoriented themselves from legal and commercial work to science and technology.

Popular demand and exhaustion of present supplies have prompted publication of a revision of the brochure issued in 1957: Scientific translations: a preliminary guide to sources and services. By retaining the same basic arrangement and format, it is our hope that this revised edition will serve as a convenient source for locating and procuring prepared translations of scientific papers which are on file in special centers in the United States and foreign countries, for obtaining information on all Soviet publications currently available in cover-to-cover translations.

This revision was prepared by Miss Miriam Hawkins, Reference Division, National Library of Medicine, and Miss Rosemary Roberts, Translating Unit, National Institutes of Health, with assistance from Mr. David Gelfand, Library, National Institutes of Health. Mr. Scott Adams, Librarian, National Institutes of Health, and Mr. Ralph O'Dette, Division of Scientific Information, National Science Foundation, have made many valuable suggestions and have assisted in its editing.
